Seychelles is a beautiful country made up of 115 paradisiacal playground, islands. We have 3 official languages Creole, French and English. Not many people are fluent in English, and have trouble speaking or spelling it. Their vocabulary isn't very vast, since Creole is their native and first language.

People who have English as their native or first language, often get made fun of and are considered as "white people", which in creole is "blan". It's not that these people don't understand creole because they do, they may not feeling comfortable speaking it or like me, have an English accent with their creole, which is certainly found amusing by most of my friends.

There's plenty of sun here, but it always rains on a Wednesday. The beaches are spectacular, and the marine life is extraordinary, you could even get lost under the waves. Mahe is the main island, therefore it's congested with cars and people, but the outer islands, those are out of this world. Where nature grows unconditionally, birds fly endlessly and little animals run free.

From a teenagers point of view, Seychelles is not quite interesting, as there's not much to do apart from going to the beach and cinema, shopping for items other than groceries is very limited. The people here are very narrow minded. Big dreams don't work here.
